
Litkie Diamond NAMAQUALAND Little Sancy Diamond

Contributed by Administrator
Friday, 21 September 2007

Litkie Diamond. Found on the Vaal River, Cape Province, Republic of South Africa, 1891. 205 carats. Location unknown.

Little (or Lesser) Namaqualand. See

NAMAQUALAND.

Little Sancy Diamond. Although from the collection of the same Seigneur de Sancy of the French Court, this 34-carat pear-shaped brilliant cut should not be confused with the 55-carat Sancy Diamond. The Little Sancy was bought by Prince Frederick of Orange in 1647 and passed down to his grandson, who became King Frederick I of Prussia. The gem was then in the Prussian Treasury for many years. It was worn on the Crown Necklace by the bride, Princess Mary of Sachsen-Altenburg, at her wedding to Prince Albert of Prussia in Berlin in 1881. In 1923, it was inventoried among the Crown Jewels of the Hohenzollern as a pendant in a 23-diamond necklace. Today, still mounted as a pendant but of a much simpler design, the Little Sancy is one of the prize possessions of the Royal Prussian House in Bremen, Germany. An alternate name is the Beau Sancy.

load. A term used in the South African diamond mines for 16 cubic feet of blue ground, or about 4/5 of a short ton. Despite the fact that mine cars carry about 20 cubic feet, the standard load used for reporting yield is the 16-cubic-foot size.